Based on these characteristics of game design, we developed a personalized learning system (PLS) that consists of various modalities of the knowledge map. This paper presents a learning module that uses a knowledge map to set up artificial goals, which are short- and long-term goals. Figure 5 shows an example of the PLS. The cognition of students can be reflected by the concept map. Students can also reflect on their learning status and monitor their city growth. Fourth, goal-setting skills are the basic and most important skills in students' academic life, which are as important as basic reading and writing skills. Although there are many games focusing on the topic of goal-setting, such as the game in Bartzela et al. (2013), these games were used for learning improvement purposes. More importantly, few games have been developed for motivating students to set up academic goals. Therefore, we developed an innovative game in order to motivate students to set up goals for mathematics. The game can be regarded as a strategy-board game. A student can play it on their mobile device and can discuss what they know and how they can improve their skills. The purpose is to help students to develop their skills and improve their performance. The basic design can be illustrated by a short story below: Students may be curious about their cities. They can go to the left side of their city and look at the map. They may notice that their cities are small and have a lot of mountains, roads, or lakes in it. In this case, they may think that they can eliminate some of them and develop their cities. They can then go to the right side of their city and see a list of mathematical goals. They can put any one of these goals on a virtual goal-bar and may set up a step-by-step action plan for achieving this goal.
